

Wildlife Research Institute presents: Baja Scammon's Lagoon Whale Expedition

Join us for an Expedition to one of the Most Unique Places on our Planet: LAGUNA OJA DE LIEBRE

History of Laguna Oja de Liebre

It was in 1857 that an American whaling captain, Charles Melville Scammon, discovered the entrance to this lagoon which the Spaniards called Oja de Liebre, Eye of the Jack Rabbit. The warm, calm waters, shallow bays, and broad tidal flats served as a prolific whale breeding ground. But man's exploitation of these mammals for their precious oil almost led to their extinction. By the turn of the 20th century, only 2,000 California gray whales were in existence. In a conservation success story, the result of international treaties and extensive efforts of the Mexican government, the worldwide California gray whale population: Ballena Gris is now estimated at over 20,000.

Scammon's Lagoon is now a restricted sanctuary for marine mammals and migratory birds...and the whales have forgiven us. In fact they are called "friendlies" and the females bring their calves to our pangas for us to appreciate and commune with them. If this trip isn't on your bucket list...it should be. Forget whale watching from a cattle boat, where you might need binoculars IF you see a whale in the distance. This is a quiet panga, with thousands of whales all around you, looking at you, swimming all around your panga, and you might find yourself petting them or even stealing a kiss.

This expedition is a 6 night, 7 day trip from San Diego to Guerrero Negro in Baja California. Guerrero Negro is also home to over 100 pair of breeding Osprey.

Everyone has a window seat. Our expert lead guide is a biologist that has travelled extensively in Baja over the last 30 years. Our team biologist is also experienced in Baja whale expeditions, avian wildlife and the endemic plants of this remarkable peninsula.
